THE WRITER'S CHALLENGE
 Creating Mood and Evoking Emotion

Page Lambert's next Sunday Brunch writing seminar spirals around creating atmosphere on the page and evoking emotion in the reader.

We all know that storylines have plot arcs. But storylines also have emotional arcs, places where a character's (or narrator's) emotions experience a rising and falling, a place where the atmosphere is crafted in such a way that the emotional tenor of a scene builds along with the reader's anticipation.

We will spend the morning examining the opening pages from a few select recipients of the 2018 GOODREADS CHOICE AWARDS (fiction and nonfiction). In the afternoon, to kick off our writing year, we will generate a few new pages of our own, sharing these drafts with each other and an eye toward developing arcs of emotion.

"The common ground shared by writer and reader, that extended country in which each may set his own horizons, is the realm of emotions. What we feel, we know and believe above all else, and so do our readers."

Peggy Simson Curry,
 Wyoming's First Poet Laureate
